SCOPE OF WORK

Interagency Agreement with the Department of State

Background

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) is the primary forum for international scientific assessments of global climate change. The International Negotiating Committee for the Framework Convention on Climate Change (INC FCCC) is the institution, established by the United Nations General Assembly, through which governments negotiate agreements for responding to climate change. The U.S. has ratified the FCCC and is an active member of both the IPCC and the INC. The activities of both institutions are part of an international effort to understand and respond to pollution of the global atmosphere. They are supported in part by voluntary annual contributions from participating governments. The contributions support the substantive work of both organizations and facilitate the participation in, and hence the scientific legitimacy and acceptance of, such work by developing countries and economies in transition. U.S. contributions are shared on an interagency basis and processed by the State Department.

FY-95 Tasks

1. IPCC

The IPCC will complete its Second Assessment of Global Climate Change. This study will include a review of the science (including estimates of greenhouse gas emissions, atmospheric concentrations, and changes in the temperature of the stratosphere and troposphere), environmental impacts and response options (including effects on ecosystems, agriculture, forests, sea level rise, and water resources), and economic research on the costs and benefits to society. The IPCC will conduct a comprehensive peer review by scientists and governments prior to publication.

Product: Three Volume Report in December 1995

2. INC-COP I The following tasks will be conducted by the Subsidiary Body on Scientific and Technological Assessment, in association with the Subsidiary Body on Implementation, to support the Conference of the Parties.

a. The INC will assess scientific and technical methods for inventorying greenhouse gas emissions and removal by sinks, estimating effects of climate change, and developing mitigation options (technologies, practices, and processes). The assessment should include, for example, a review of emission forecasting tools, atmospheric models, adaptation methods, and economic models. The INC should review current research and prepare recommended methods for use by governments in the preparation of national communications.

Product: A series of documents and workbooks for use by governments in complying with the FCCC (beginning in 1995).

b. The INC will develop technical guidelines for evaluating the effectiveness of national communications (measures and programs) in reducing pollution of the atmosphere. These guidelines will include scientific methods, national circumstances, financing mechanisms, and research and development activities. The INC will evaluate the guidelines through a series of national reviews and prepare recommendations for the COP (1996 -97).

Product: A series of reports on the effectiveness of national plans from Annex I countries for COP2 and 3. A paper summarizing the results and recommending changes to the technical guidelines for consideration at COP (1996-97).

c. The INC will identify innovative and state of the art technologies and prepare advice on the means of promoting the development and transfer of such technologies. The INC will review available studies and information, as well as programs to deploy technologies. These efforts should be directed at identifying barriers to developing and deploying technology and options to overcome the barriers. The types of activities to be considered may include: country studies, expert centers, financial mechanisms and incentives, national research and development programs, and other institutional arrangements.

Product: A study of innovative and state of the art technologies to reduce emission and adapt to climate change for the COP.

Deliverables

All reports are to be provided to the EPA project officer and representative to the IPCC and INC,
